

...I [also] wanted to update you on my first year at Harvard. I absolutely love it up here, and I couldn't imagine myself anywhere else. The students and professors here are amazing, and every day I am astounded by something new that is happening on campus. I have not yet declared my major, but I am thinking of majoring in neurobiology, with a minor in Global Health and Health Policy. I am also pursuing a citation (one step below a minor) in French. I am studying abroad this summer in Paris, where I will be taking two biology courses and working with the UN Sustainable Development Goals to help make Paris more sustainable. I am so incredibly excited for this opportunity because it allows me to pursue three of my greatest passions (biology, French, and sustainable development). It is like the program was designed for me! While there, we will also be working with a Parisian research center, the mayor's office, and students from the Sciences Po.

While my schedule as a Division I diver has meant that I no longer have time to be a member of our travel Model United Nations team, I have not forgotten my love for international relations. I am currently on the Writing Board for the Harvard International Review, a quarterly magazine that publishes articles about international issues, as well as interviews with world leaders. We are sold in over 50 countries around the world, and we are actually the only publication on campus to have our own barcode. We also have a newly-renovated website, hir.harvard.edu. You can find a couple of my previous articles by searching my name, Megan Galbreath, in the search bar at the top.

Please let me know if there is anything else that you need on my end for processing the scholarship money! Thank you for everything!

Best,
Megan Galbreath
